Abstract:

Being reflective is one of the attributes of the IB learner profile, where the process is seen as involving the development of students' self-cognition, including the understanding of their strengths and weaknesses, based on which the students learning and personal development can be better supported. Reflection is an integral and important part of the inquiring learning cycle; the effectiveness of reflection also directly affects the effectiveness of learning. It's worth mentioning that reflective activities are not only meaningful for students' learning but also useful for teachers' teaching. In this sharing, specific examples of teaching literature will be used to demonstrate how students' reflective thinking can be strengthened in teaching DP literature courses and the importance of reflective teaching for teachers.
